WASTE—TIME WORK

Men are still fighting machines believing in the face of all the evidence that there is only so much work to go around. But there are indications of a growing impatience with such misconception. In the present negotiations in the United States between the publishers and the International Typographical Union there is a suggestion that one of the most hoary of these customs might have to go by the board. Forty years ago, in an effort to speed the delivery of newspapers, publishers agreed to what was known as the "bogus rule". This rule provided that newspapers could accept plates or mats from another paper to enable the papers to combine their efforts in the interests of greater speed. But once the urgent need was over, and the papers were on the street, all this material had to be set in each of the newspapers using it. Then without it ever having served a single useful purpose the type was again distributed. This make work rule was popularly known as "dead horse". For nothing can be dealer than an effort expended to no useful end. This idea that has lived for forty years stems from the fixed belief that if anyone shortens an operation he robs a worker. It is one of the reasons for added cost that benefits no one.

When Arkwright invented his cotton spinning machine in 1769 dire results to labor were prophesied. Doubtless for the time, some workers were inconvenienced by the change for all changes whether good or bad involve certain dislocations. In England of that day there were 7,900 persons engaged in the production of textiles. It was just twenty-seven years later that a full parliamentary inquiry was made in the industry. Just twenty-seven years, remember, but the inquiry disclosed the fact that Arkwright's machine, far from robbing the worker of his job, had increased the number of workers employed in the industry from 7,900 to 320,000 or a little better than 4,100 per cent.

DDT WINTER WEAR BEFORE STORING

About this time of year housewives are busy housecleaning. Part of their job entails packing away sweaters, overcoats, underwear and other winter garments. Never is this task undertaken without misgivings that the same clothes, when taken out in the fall, will be punctured with moth holes.

Seldom are these tiny moths seen. If they are, they are very elusive and almost impossible to catch. Contrary to popular belief, adult moths are not directly responsible for the holes since they rarely feed at all. They lay their pinhead sized eggs on fabric with one female capable of laying 100 to 150. These hatch into larvae in about five days which immediately begin feeding on wool, feathers and other materials with exceptions of cotton and nylon.

Since all stages of clothes moths are found in wardrobes, effective control can be obtained by spraying all surfaces, corners and cracks before the clothes are put away with a five per cent DDT household spray, the same product used for walls and ceilings to kill flies. DDT is deadly to adult and larval stages of moths if used as specified.

If a high quality five per cent DDT household spray is used there is no danger of it having any objectionable effects on the clothes. If fabrics are infested it is advisable to apply the spray directly then hang them out to air. If not only the interior of the wardrobe need be treated.

Residue left after spraying remains toxic to the insects for several months so that protection is afforded for the entire season.
